foreign buyers has helped the housing market in its resurgence. There are signs, however, that point to this trend slowing dramatically. One of these factors is the strength of the dollar. The stronger dollar investments. According to RealtyTrac, for those institutional investors who purchased a home in 2012, they could see a 38%-43% return if they sold now. This also means that far fewer institutional investors will be and other financial baggage. For these reasons, expect lenders to still be stringent with who they lend to.
